

Learning from harm education 2025

The Learning from harm education programme run by Te Tāhū Hauora Health Quality & Safety Commission helps participants:

- review health care harm while improving consumer, whānau and health care worker safety
- understand everyday work that supports healing, learning and improving, in a consistent way
- create quality improvement actions across health systems to reduce the risk of harm.

The education programme promotes a national approach, across the health and disability sector, to meet the eight guiding principles of the revised Healing learning and improving from harm | Te whakaora, te ako me to whakapai ake i te kino: national adverse events policy 2023.

Workshops cover how to conduct an effective review of harm in a range of health care settings. It uses the learning review method as recommended within the 2023 policy to:

- understand the essential components of high-quality reviews of harm
- participate in a simulated learning review as a member of the review team.

Education programme format

The programme includes three components (one of which is optional). Participants must complete approximately 10 hours of self-directed online learning and attend the in-person workshop to receive their certificate. Details follow.

Part 1: Launch (lunchtime session via Zoom) voluntary - Short welcome to the programme and Q&A session.

Part 2: Online modules (10 hours) - Participants can complete the online modules any time between Part 1 and the Part 3 workshop. The modules include watching a series of videos, completing a workbook and some e-learning. Part 2 must be completed before the Part 3 workshop.

Part 3: Learning review workshop - Participants take part in a simulated learning review at this interactive, in-person workshop. A variety of scenarios are offered: general health, mental health and addiction, maternity or disability. Participants select their preferred scenario during registration and we will do our best to accommodate this.
